Continue

Draco hermione fanfic

Draco hermione fanfiction m. Draco hermione fanfic isolation. Draco hermione fanfiction forced pregnancy. Draco hermione fanfiction marriage law. Draco hermione fanfic book. Draco hermione fanfiction. Draco hermione fanfic best. Draco hermione fanfiction net. Draco hermione fanfiction manacled. Draco hermione fanfic recommendations. Draco hermione fanfiction book. Draco hermione fanfic pregnant. Draco hermione fanfiction best. Draco hermione fanfiction wattpad. Draco hermione fanfic manacled.

Hermione Granger is pursuing a medical degree and creating new healing spells while Draco Malfoy is taking on occasional auror jobs and renovating his estate. Despite their contrasting lifestyles, they're both lonelier than they realize. A freak accident in a Muggle hospital brings them together, allowing each to discover that friendship can be found in unexpected places. Hermione Granger, a skilled medical researcher and Healer, is about to make a groundbreaking discovery as an Auror assigned to protect her from forces beyond their control. Meanwhile, Draco Malfoy, a hyper-competent and fiery individual, has been tasked with safeguarding Hermione's well-being, despite his initial reluctance. As they embark on a perilous journey together, the unlikely duo must navigate treacherous landscapes and confront their personal demons. The boundaries between their emotions and actions become increasingly blurred as they learn to trust each other in order to survive. Despite their growing feelings for one another, Draco's motivations remain shrouded in mystery, leaving Hermione to wonder if he is truly committed to their partnership or merely playing a game of cat and mouse. Their banter and sparring matches serve as a facade, masking the depth of their emotions and the true nature of their connection. As they face numerous challenges together, including encounters with dark forces and personal struggles, Draco begins to realize that his feelings for Hermione go beyond mere camaraderie. The question remains, however, whether he is willing to confront his own demons and make a choice between his loyalty to himself and his growing love for the Healer. Through their shared experiences, Hermione and Draco must learn to balance their individual strengths and weaknesses, forging an unbreakable bond that will see them through even the most treacherous of times. She stood tall, her eyes locked on his. "We both are," she said, her voice firm. He couldn't argue with that. She walked away, leaving him standing alone. Again, she whispered, barely audible. But he knew it was a command. It was one he was happy to follow. Draco caught himself, his eyes roving over her slender figure in the red dress. "Since when does Hermione wear a dress like that?" he thought, but didn't say. She felt like wearing anything she wanted. He stepped aside, opening the door for her. "After you," he said, his voice tight with restraint. She moved towards the bar, him following close behind. They had spent one last night together at the Ministry Gala, but now it was over. Hermione planned to move on, but Draco's presence kept her from doing so easily. As they entered a room full of people, she smiled and waved, while he hovered discreetly in the background, watching her. He knew how much she hated being the center of attention. But tonight, with him by her side, she seemed almost radiant. "Hermione—" He winced as his voice was cut off abruptly, but before he could react, a hand touched his chest, stopping his movement. She was close, too close. He felt his body tense up, trying to maintain control over the sudden surge of emotion that threatened to overwhelm him. She spoke in a voice barely above a whisper, yet the panic was palpable, making every word feel like it was being ripped from her vocal cords. "Why did Draco Malfoy just go ballistic about his... wife?" The question hung in the air, almost suffocating her. Harry's eyes widened in surprise, and Lucas pinched the bridge of his nose, clearly exasperated by the recent turn of events. She forced herself to continue, her voice trembling ever so slightly. "He was talking about you, my dear. That was another question you got wrong. Your name is actually Hermione Jean Granger-Malfoy." The revelation sent her tumbling into a dark abyss, and she had to be sedated once more. A family with a father as the Head of Slytherin House creates an unsurprising sorting result for Hermione. Her name is now Hermione Snape, and she's determined to take down Magical Britain. The person responsible for her parents' deaths will face justice, along with anyone who gets in her way. Real heroes never give up, and real villains never die. This Dramione story features a post-war espionage AU and is complete. It has a large cast of characters and takes place after the war. In another storyline, Hermione discovers a way to defeat Voldemort but must keep it hidden from everyone she cares about. The only person she trusts may be the one she hates the most. During their 8th year at Hogwarts, students are paired with others for coursework. Professor McGonagall pairs Hermione with the youngest Death Eater in history as he tries to change his image. As they form a reluctant friendship, Hermione learns that Draco has almost no experience with girls since age fifteen and offers her help. This is also the premise of a podfic called Private Tutor. Draco discovers how much another version of himself loves another version of Hermione by going to a concert after getting trapped in another universe. Part 3 of The World Across the Mirror series, it's a story about two versions of characters and their love for each other. An ancient artifact unearthed at the Ministry sets off events that force Hermione to confront her past and an unsettling prophecy. Bound by fate and mystery, she must join forces with Draco, who she vowed never to trust, to unlock the orb's secrets. As they uncover truths, the lines between duty and desire blur, and their actions could reshape or destroy the wizarding world altogether. A story unfolds about Draco Malfoy's transformation after being disinherited and grappling with the aftermath of the Second Wizarding War. He meticulously renovates an old apothecary shop into a sanctuary where he discovers new aspects of himself, particularly when a figure from his past arrives unexpectedly. As they form an unlikely friendship, Draco rediscovers his place in the world and learns that true strength lies in embracing the future rather than dwelling on the past. Tapestry was woven with a mix of dark and light as she saw the empty hallway before her, while Cormac continued his relentless pursuit. However, he failed to notice where she stood. As soon as McLaggen vanished, Hermione's grip on her waist relaxed, and the hand covering her mouth fell away. She closed her eyes, prayed for good fortune, and attempted to calm down, but when she opened them again, her breath caught in her throat. Blaise Zabini was nowhere to be seen, but instead, Draco Malfoy stood before her, his presence both captivating and unnerving. A typical day turned extraordinary when Draco's realm experienced chaos. As an accomplished Auror, Draco should have anticipated this, as unusual events often begin normally. A law of Muggle physics, perhaps. However, Draco found himself off guard when he and Hermione encountered their doppelgängers from another dimension. The unexpected appearances of multiple pairs of duplicates left him stunned. Draco paired up with his alternate selves, each more incompetent than the last, while Hermione linked with her own versions, each equally stunning and brilliant. Their mission was twofold: to unravel the mystery behind these inter-dimensional copies' sudden appearances and save their respective worlds. Throughout this ordeal, each Draco attempted to charm his Granger counterpart and demonstrate his superiority over the others. Meanwhile, Hermione remained focused on solving the enigma and saving the day. Looking back, she never would have guessed that he'd be interested in her. Seeing him again, eleven years after his disappearance, was a shock, but not entirely unexpected, given his transformation into a charming gentleman. She'd have turned a blind eye to their complicated history and taken what she wanted – a great night with someone who knew what he was doing. And he did seem experienced, but that idea quickly flew out the window when he mentioned working for the wizarding ministry in London, where she also worked. The tension between them was palpable as they both struggled to suppress their attraction, which had been simmering since their first encounter. I told you it's time for you to leave my store. Miss Granger, I didn't come all this way just to be turned away. You won't be mocked like you did to me at Hogwarts. Yet, you defended me in some ways during our sixth year. He spoke calmly, tapping his fingers on the desk. Hermione looked up to him through her dark rose-colored glasses. "You saved us at my parents' Manor, so call it even," she said. "And at the manor, I know something happened when my aunt carved into your arm. I'm right, aren't I?" He asked, waiting for her response. Out now! Hermione growled out under her breath. Draco waved his left finger, "Tsk, tsk, your fangs are showing." Hermione covered her mouth, "I said get out now!" Her voice was muffled as she reached up and grabbed her wand from her bun with her right hand. Draco held up his hands in defeat. "I get it, but just so you know: I would watch how far you let things go. If you continue letting it fester without trying to control it you will lose yourself, little Bibliophile Princess." In various global locations, a woman navigates a complex life. Following her loss in the last conflict, she's left to raise a lively five-year-old daughter on her own. The weight of this responsibility is compounded by her desire for a sense of stability. Her life takes another dramatic turn with the arrival of Hermione Granger, whose presence brings both healing and new challenges.